

Job Search Sites

Just like Google searches the entire Internet for websites, there are search engines that search the Internet for job postings.

Two very popular job search engines are Indeed and SimplyHired.

These are quick and easy to use, and often provide a large number of results.

Clicking on a result would then lead you to whichever website the job posting came from.

Corey starts by going to the Indeed website, typing “indeed.com” into the web browser address bar. He could also search for it using Google or another search engine.

The indeed home page has a search box in the middle. We can type any search word or phrase in the first box.

It can be a job title, keyword, or company. The second box holds the location where we want to find jobs.

Corey types out “Stocker” in the box under “What.”

The top right corner of the results list shows the number of jobs Corey found, 51. If this seemed like to many results to page through, Corey could use the limiters on the left to include results with only certain criteria. For example, he could limit to jobs at a closer distance, or within a specific salary range.

We also see a few advertisements on the page. Notice the first listing says “sponsored.” This means it’s an ad. More ads are on the right side of the page. We’ll ignore these and focus on our real results.

Each listing features a job title or headline in blue. A company name and location is on the next line. The company names also show a rating given by employees. Some companies even have reviews that other people have written about working there. Finally, a brief description is listed under each job.
